

November 8, 2005

The Honorable XXX
Member, U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Congressman XXX:

Much has changed in the decade since Congress passed the 1996 Telecommunications Act. As Congress is considering changes and updates to this landmark legislation, we would like to remind you of the urgent need for reform of franchise regulations.

Competitors are eager to use new technology to bring Americans a wide range of video services over the Internet, called IPTV. Not only can this technology offer needed competition to the television services offered by the cable companies, but it also can improve health care in rural and urban America, provide educational resources for students and parents and bring lower-cost broadband access to small and midsize companies.

The current, but outdated, franchise regulations were designed for a monopoly environment. New entrants to these markets are stymied not by technology or lack of consumer interest, but rather by the requirement to negotiate franchise agreements in more than 33,000 municipalities across the country. Whatever changes you make to the Telecom Act, please ensure that you recognize the importance of reforming franchise regulations so consumers will benefit from the lower prices, better customer service, and innovations competition will bring to this market.

Sincerely,

Robert G. de Posada
President